† Inhou·sehold, v. Obs. rare⁻⁰. [In-¹.] trans. To domesticate.

1611 Florio, Infamigliarsi, to become familiar or to inhoushould himselfe.

Inhuman (inhiū·măn), a. (sb.) Forms: 5 inhumayn, 6–7 inhumane, -aine, 7– inhuman. [ad. L. inhūmān-us, f. in- (In-³) + hūmānus Human. In earliest examples app. after F. inhumain, -aine (15th c. in Hatz.-Darm.).

The stress was originally, as in F., on the final syllable, but by the close of the 16th c. metrical evidence shows the distinction of inhu'man and inhuma'ne in verse, though without apparent distinction of meaning. The prose pronunciation was then probably inhu'man, but the spelling inhumane was almost invariable till after 1700 (cf. Human, Humane). After the spelling inhuman came in, the spelling and pronunciation inhuma'ne became app. very rare. Bailey (after 1730), Johnson, and other 18th c. dictionaries which distinguish hu'man and huma'ne in pronunciation and sense, recognize for the negative only inhu'man, and Todd 1818 appears not to have known inhuma'ne, for he says 'There is now no distinction observed between inhuman and inhumane: formerly it was inhumane with the accent on the last syllable'. Ash 1775 distinguishes 'Inhu'man, barbarous, cruel, void of compassion', and 'Inhuma'ne, void of tenderness, unkind (But not much used)'. The second entry may refer only to the 17th c. word. None of the 19th c. dictionaries, until quite recently, record inhumane (exc. as an obsolete form of inhuman). It may therefore be concluded that inhumane in current use has been formed afresh on humane, in order to provide an exact negative to the latter, and thus a word of milder meaning than inhuman. (In treating the two words, we place under Inhuman all quots. bef. 1600 however spelt, all 17th c. metrical quots. which show the stress on in-, and all 17th c. or later examples spelt inhuman.)]

They were originally granted only by the Court of Chancery: commonly, to stay one party to an action from continuing that action, if there was an equitable, though not a legal defence thereto. By the Judicature Act of 1873, all divisions of the High Court received full power to grant injunctions. According to their purpose, injunctions are either restrictive (restraining) or mandatory; as to their force, they are either interlocutory (provisional, temporary, ad interim), or perpetual (permanent). (In Sc. Law, the equivalent of a restrictive injunction is an Interdict.)

-in-law. [f. In prep. + Law sb.] A phrase appended to names of relationship, as father, mother, brother, sister, son, etc., to indicate that the relationship is not by nature, but in the eye of the Canon Law, with reference to the degrees of affinity within which marriage is prohibited. These forms can be traced back to the 14th c.: see Brother-in-Law. Formerly -in-law was also used to designate those relationships which are now expressed by step-, e.g. son-in-law = step-son, father-in-law = step-father; this, though still locally or vulgarly current, is now generally considered a misuse.

In recent colloquial or journalistic phraseology, in-law has been humorously used to designate any relative so connected. Hence In-law'ry, the position of an 'in-law'.

Mag.* Jan. 24 The position of the 'in-laws' (a happy phrase which is attributed .. to her Majesty, than whom no one can be better acquainted with the article) is often not very apt to promote happiness. 1898 Daily News 7 Jan. 4/7 'I don't live with them'—with the 'in-laws'. 1898 *Westm. b. Inns of Chancery: certain houses or sets of buildings in London, originally places of residence and study for students and apprentices of law; also the societies by which they were occupied.

From the 15th or 16th to the 18th c., these were subordinate to the Inns of Court; but they now perform no public function, though several still exist as societies possessing corporate property, the chambers being occupied by solicitors and others.

Introd. § 1. 26 note, The inns of chancery are, Clifford's Inn, Clement's Inn, Lion's Inn, New Inn, Furnival's Inn, Thavies's Inn, Staple's Inn, and Barnard's Inn. These are subordinate to the inns of court; the three first belong to the Inner Temple, the fourth to the Middle Temple, the two next to Lincoln's Inn, and the two last to Gray's Inn. 1883 Wharton's Law Lex. (ed. 7), Inns of Chancery,..these were formerly preparatory colleges for students, and many entered them before they were admitted into the Inns of Court. They [now] consist chiefly of solicitors, and possess corporate property, hall, chambers, etc., but perform no public functions like the Inns of Court.

c. Inns of Court: the four sets of buildings in London (the Inner Temple, the Middle Temple, Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn) belonging to the four legal societies which have the exclusive right of admitting persons to practise at the bar, and hold a course of instruction and examination for that purpose; hence, these four societies themselves. (Formerly also colloq. inns a court.)

The distinction of the 'foure principall Iunes' of law as Inns of Court, was fully established in the 15th c.: see quot. a 1485 in b. But in earlier times, and sometimes later, the name Inns of Court, or its equivalent, seems to have included both the hospitia majora and hospitia minora: cf. quots. 1355, 1458, and 1580 (referring to the same event) in b, with 1548 and 1597 here.

We ought to consider that places like Serjeants' Inn have now no sort of practical utility.

† Some of the Inns of Chancery and of Court derive their specific names from those of noblemen or persons of quality, whose residence or property they formerly were, and from whom they were at first often rented. It has hence been sometimes assumed that the term inn here meant originally 'the town-house or residence' of such nobleman or gentleman, e. g. that 'Lincoln's Inn' meant originally 'the Earl of Lincoln's town-house': but there is no evidence that inn ever had any such specific sense (as distinct from its general sense of 'habitation, lodging, house', sense 2), and no proof that any of these houses bore the name hospitium or inn, until it was actually the hospitium or hostel of a body of students.

†Inne, adv. and prep. Obs. Forms: a. 1–2 innan, 2–3 innen, (2 inna). β. 1–5 inne, (4–5 ynne). [OE. had two derivatives of in-: a. OE. innan adv. and prep. (of motion and position) with gen., dat., acc., = OS. innan, OFris. inna adv. and prep. with dat., acc., OHG. innana, innan adv. and prep. with gen., dat., acc. (MHG., mod. G. innen), Goth. innana, ON. innan adv. and prep. with gen.; β. OE. inne adv. of position, = OS., OFris. inne adv., Goth. inna, ON. inni adv., OHG. inna, inni, inne adv. and prep. 'within'. These two words were originally different in sense, innan being orig. 'from within', but in late OE. there remained little or no distinction between innan and inne as adverbs; the main difference being that inne was only an adv., while innan was both adv. and prep. A few examples of innan as prep. are found in 12th c.; and innen adv. occurs in Hatton Gospels and Layamon. Inna prep. in Lamb. Hom. may be an error for innan or inne. But the ordinary early ME. form for both adv. and prep. was inne, frequent in Southern writings of 12–14th c. It is very rare in the Kentish of Shoreham and the Ayenbite, in which the prep. is regularly ine. In northern works, from Cursor Mundi onwards, and in Midland works after the time when final -e became mute, inne (ynne) appears to be merely an occasional spelling of in.]

Inorganic (inɔ̄ɹgæ·nik), a. [f. IN-3 + ORGANIC. Cf. F. inorganique, and next.]

1. Not characterized by having organs or members fitted for special functions; not formed with the organs or instruments of life, or with the organization peculiar to living beings; destitute of organized physical structure: said of inanimate matter and bodies formed of it without vital action.

Inorganic world, nature, the material world outside the animal and vegetable kingdoms; the world of matter, with the mechanical and chemical forces to which it is subject.

1794 SULLIVAN View Nat. I. 464 We may safely conclude that the mineral kingdom, that assemblage of brute inorganic bodies .. has yet distinct families and species. 1796 KIRWAN Elem. Faith iv. ii. § 5. 221 In the inorganic world we observe action and re-action. 1889 A. R. WALLACE Darwinism 17 There is a yet deadlier enemy in the forces of inorganic nature.

b. Chem. Of elements, compounds, etc.: Not entering into the composition of organized bodies; not formed under the action of the vital forces.

1831 R. KNOX Cloquet's Anat. 2 In living bodies there are two kinds of elements, inorganic and organic. The inorganic elements are those which may be obtained by the processes of chemistry from minerals as well as organized bodies. 1832 T. THOMSON Chem. Org. Chem. (ed. 12) 2 The division of compounds into two distinct branches, inorganic and organic,—formed .. the latter only under the influence of a supposed vital force—must therefore be abandoned.

c. Inorganic Chemistry, that branch of Chemistry which investigates inorganic compounds; the chemistry of mineral substances.

As all organized bodies contain carbon, Organic Chemistry is usually defined as 'the chemistry of the carbon compounds', while Inorganic Chemistry comprises that of all the other elements and their combinations.

[1812. T. THOMSON title, A System of Chemistry of Inorganic Bodies. The stem of the word evidently represents L. sigill-um 'little sign, figure, or token, seal' (dim. of L. signum 'sign, mark, token'), whence OF. seel, Eng. SEAL; but the origin of the prefix in- in the Teutonic forms is obscure, since no late or med.L. insigillum appears. Franck (Etym. Woordenbk. Nederl. T. s.v. Zegel) suggests that it may have been taken over in some way from L. insigne 'mark, sign', used also in med.L. in sense 'seal'. In the verb, the prefix raises less difficulty; a med.L. insigillare actually occurs (though sometimes as a rendering of OE. inseglian), and enseeler is common in OF. (see ENSEAL v.).]

a 1533 UDALL Royster D. IV. vi. (Arb.) 70 Dyd not I knowe afore of the insurance Betweene Gawyn Goodlucke, and Christian Custance?

4. Comm. The act or system of insuring property, life, etc.; a contract by which the one party (usually a company or corporation) undertakes, in consideration of a payment (called a premium) proportioned to the nature of the risk contemplated, to secure the other against pecuniary loss, by payment of a sum of money in the event of destruction of or damage to property (as by disaster at sea, fire, or other accident), or of the death or disablement of a person; the department of business which deals with such contracts. Also called ASSURANCE (and in 17th c. sometimes ENSURANCE).

Assurance is the earlier term, used alike of marine and life insurance before the end of 16th c. Its general application is retained in the titles and policies of some long-established companies (e. g. the London Assurance Corporation). Insurance (in 17th c. also ENSURANCE) occurs first in reference to fire (1635 in INSURE v. 4), but soon became coextensive with assurance, the two terms being synonymous in Magens 1755 (see ASSURANCE 5). Assurance would probably have dropped out of use (as it has almost done in U.S.), but that Babbage in 1826 (see quot.) proposed to restrict insurance to risks to property, and assurance to life insurance. This has been followed so far that assurance is now rarely used of marine, fire, or accident insurance, and is retained in Great Britain in the nomenclature and use of the majority of life insurance companies. But in general popular use, insurance is the prevalent term. Mr. T. B. Sprague, followed by others, considers assurance, assure, assurer, etc., the proper words for the action of the company or persons undertaking the risk, insurance, insure, insurer, etc., for that of the person paying the premium. This would be in some respects a useful distinction, if it could be carried out; but it would leave the members of mutual societies at once assurers and insurers.

If this distinction be admitted assurance will signify a contract dependent on the duration of life, which must either happen or fail; and insurance will mean a contract relating to any other uncertain event which may partly happen or partly fail. 1848 ARNOULD Mar. Insur. (1866) I. I. i. 3 Marine Insurance.. in its essential nature is a contract of indemnity. 1853 A. FARR in *Reg. Said either of the person who pays the premium, or of the office or underwriters who undertake the risk. For the latter many offices and writers prefer assure (now esp. in reference to life insurance). The object of the vb. is either (a) the amount secured, or (b) the property or life, sometimes the person: see quots.

a. (of a function): That quantity of which the given function is the differential or differential coefficient (corresponding to the fluent of a given fluxion in Newton's method); so called because it may be regarded as the whole sum of a series of consecutive values assumed by an infinitesimal function (differential) of the variable while the latter changes continuously from any one value to any other. When such limits of variation are fixed or determinate, it is called a definite integral: see quot. 1877. An integral is denoted by the sign ∫ (originally a long s, for L. summa sum); in a definite integral the inferior and superior limits are indicated at the bottom and top of the sign, thus $\int_a^b$. (Formerly sometimes applied to the quantity from which a given 'finite difference' or 'increment' is derived, as in quot. 1763; cf. quot. 1831 s.v. INTEGRATE v. 3.) b. (of a differential equation, or a system of such equations): An equation or system of equations from which the given equation or system can be derived by differentiation. (In relation to a system of equations, any quantity which that system makes constant is sometimes called its integral.)

In contradistinction, the name indefinite integrals is often applied to integrals .. in which the form of the function is merely taken into account, without regard to any assigned limits. 1882 MAXWELL Electr. & Magn. I. 97 The double integrals destroy each other.

The extensive and complex development of senses in L. and OF. is reflected also in English. But the chronological appearance of the senses here does not accord with their original development; those first taken over from French in 13–14th c. being figurative uses, far removed from the literal sense, which was only adopted directly from L. about or after 1600. As an attempt at chronological order would only end in chaos, a logical arrangement, according in the main with the development as gathered from all three languages, is here followed. But the history of some senses is obscure: see VI. The sense of early quotations is also often difficult to determine.]

II. Specific uses.

10. Surg. and Med. An aim or purpose in a healing process; hence, a plan or method of treatment. [med. L. curationis intentio, transl. ὁ τῆς ἰάσεως σκοπός Galen (ed. Kühn I. 385).] arch.

c 1400 Lanfranc's Cirurg. 18 Al þe entencioun of a surgian, how diuers þat it be, it is on [of] þre maneres, þe first is vndoynge of þat, þat is hool, þe secunde to hele þat, þat is broke, þe .iij. is remeuynge of þat, þat is to myche. 1541 R. And yᵉ thyrde is to correct yᵉ accydentes. 1701 T. b. spec. in first intention, the healing of a lesion or fracture by the immediate re-union of the severed parts, without granulation; second intention, the healing of a wound by granulation after suppuration.

1543 Traheron Vigo's Chirurg. (1586) 13c b, Solution of continuitie in the flesh may be restored by the waie of the first intention. 1767 Gooch Treat. Wounds I. 130 The first intention belongs to incised wounds, and is performed, by bringing their lips, as much as possible, into contact .. The second intention is accomplished, by promoting digestion, and regeneration of the loss of substance. 1813 J. Thomson *Lect. Brown Rab & F. II. (1862) 26 The wound healed 'by the first intention'.

11. Logic. The direction or application of the mind to an object; a conception formed by directing the mind to some object; a general concept. First intentions, primary conceptions of things, formed by the first or direct application of the mind to the things themselves; e. g. the concepts of a tree, an oak. Second intentions, secondary conceptions formed by the application of thought to first intentions in their relations to each other; e. g. the concepts of genus, species, variety, property, accident, difference, identity.

The introduction of these terms is due to the early Latin translation of Avicenna, in which the Arabic معقولات maʿqūlāt 'perceptions, notions', pl. of معقول maʿqūl 'what is perceived by the intellect, intelligible, known', is rendered by intentiones. Thus tr. Avicenna Metaph. I, 2 (Prantl II. 321) Subjectum vero logicæ, sicut scisti, sunt intentiones intellectæ secundo [المعقولات الثانية al-maʿqūlāt al-ṯāniyah], quæ apponuntur intentionibus primo intellectis [المعقولات الاولى al-maʿqūlāt al-ūlā], secundum quod per eas pervenitur de cognito ad incognitum. Hence in Albertus Magnus (1193–1280) Metaph. I, I, 1 (Opp. ed. Jammy, Lugd. 1651, III. 3/1) Scientiæ logicæ non considerant ens et partem entis aliquam, sed intentiones secundas circa res per sermonem positas, per quas viæ habentur veniendi de noto ad ignotum. Pacius (Aristot. Organ., 1584) identifies intentio with notio 'notion': 'prima notio seu prima intentio'.

1550 Bale Image Both Ch. II. Pref. 2 b, Subtilltees, seconde intencyons, intrinsecall moodes. 1551 Robinson tr. More's Utopia II. vi. (1895) 185 Our newe Logicians .. were neuer yet able to fynde out the seconde intentyons; in so muche that none of them all coulde euer see man hymselfe in commen, as they call hym. 1638 Rouse Heav. Acad. ii. 13 For things of the second intention, to discern them we ascend above Sense unto Reason, and see them with our Understandings. 1646 Sir T. Browne Pseud. Ep. I. iii. 9 Not attaining the..second intention of the words. 1852 Mansel Notes Aldrich's Logic (ed. 2) 20 First Intentions, as conceptions of things, are predicable of the individuals conceived under them..Second Intentions are not so predicable .. When Genus is said to be predicable of Species, it is not meant that we can predicate the one second Intention of the other, so as to say, 'Species is Genus'; but that the first intention 'animal' is predicable of the first intention 'man'; the relation of the one to the other being expressed by the second intentions 'genus' and 'species'. For this reason, Logic was said [by Avicenna] to treat of second intentions applied to first. 1864 Bowen Logic V. 112.

12. Theol. One of the three things necessary, according to the Schoolmen, to the effectual administration and validity of a Sacrament, the two others being Matter and Form: see quots.

Dict.* 397 The following is the eleventh canon of the Council of Trent:—'If any shall say that there is not required in the ministers while they perform and confer the sacraments, at least the intention of doing what the Church does, let him be accursed'. 1869 Haddan Apost. Success. viii. (1879) 267 Popes like Alexander VIII. may tell us..that a minister invalidates a rite by withdrawing his interior intention from it,..soberer schoolmen .. limit the required intention to nothing more at the least than a virtual intention to do as the Church does.

b. R. C. Ch. Special or particular intention, a special purpose or end for which mass is celebrated, prayers are offered up, etc. as the spiritual welfare of some person, etc.

The intention is the clause in which the pursuer embodies his demand; for example, thus: 'Should it appear that Numerius Negidius ought to give ten thousand sesterces to Aulus Agerius'.

‖ Inter (intəɹ), the L. preposition = 'between', 'among', occurs in a few Latin phrases occasional in Eng., e.g. inter alia, amongst other things (less usually inter alios, amongst others, other persons); inter nos, between ourselves; inter se, between or among themselves. († Rarely with English object.)

Inter-, prefix. The Latin preposition and adv., inter 'between, among, amid, in between, in the midst', entered into combination with verbs, adjs., and sbs., as in intercēdĕre to go between, intercede, intercipĕre to seize on the way, intercept, interdīcere to interpose in speech, interdict, interjacēre to throw between, interject, interpōnĕre to put between, interpose, intervenīre to come between, intervene intercalāris intercalary, interdigitālis lying between the fingers, interfluus flowing between, intermedius intermediate, intermūrālis between walls; interamnium a place between rivers, intercilium the space between the eyebrows, intercolumnium the space between two columns, internuntius a messenger between, interregnum the time between two reigns, intervallum the space between two ramparts, interval. Some of these uses received great extension in late L. and the Romanic languages.

Of all these classes representatives are found in English, the earlier derived through French, the later often immediately from Latin. The Fr. form of the prefix is entre-, and it was with entre- or enter-, as in entrechange, entercourse, enterfere, that these words were taken into ME., and new compounds formed in Eng. itself: see ENTER-. But, between the 15th and 17th centuries, entre-, enter- gradually yielded to the L. inter-; entertain and enterprise, with their derivatives, being now the only relics of the earlier form. On the pattern of the words from L., many new derivatives have been formed from L. (or Gr.) elements; esp. the adjs. formed on the type (rare in L.) of inter-mūr-ālis: see 4 below.

In some cases English received from Latin and French both the simple word and its inter- compound: such are change, inter-change, commune, inter-commune, view, inter-view, column, inter-column. By extension from such compounds, inter- became a living prefix, freely used to form new compounds upon verbs, nouns, and adjs., not merely of Latin and French, but of native English origin, as in inter-twine, inter-talk, inter-brain, inter-tidal. Finally, the same process which produced such adjs. as anti-slavery, anti-vaccination, anti-war (see ANTI- 4), has produced the adjs. inter-college, inter-island, inter-town, inter-university.

The following are the uses of the prefix as an English formative element.

I. In adverbial or adjectival relation to the second element.

1. Prefixed to verbs, participles, vbl. sbs., and ppl. adjs., to form verbs, etc.

These are entered here in the uninflected form as verbs, but some of them are exemplified only in the form of participles or vbl. sbs. As a rule, wherever there is a verb compounded with inter-, the usual derivatives (vbl. sb. and ppl. a. in -ing, agent-n. in -er) are possible. Some of the verbs may be regarded as formed from sbs., e.g. inter-loud, -dash, -layer, -mesh, -net, -word. The stress is on the radical element.

a. Denoting 'Between or among other things or persons; between the parts of, in the intervals of, or in the midst of, something; together with; between times or places, at intervals, here and there': as interbreathe (interbreathing vbl. sb.), -chase, -check, -circle, -cloud, -come, -crust, -curl, -dash, -distinguish (interdistinguishable adj.), -fillet, -flash, -forge, -gild (in pa. pple. -gilt), -insert, -involve, -layer, -lie (in pres. pple. -lying), -lighten, -mention, -pave, -peal, -receive, -rule, -set, † -situate, -smile, -sole, -squeeze, -tinge, -trace, -whistle, -word. With an intr. verb, inter- sometimes stands in prepositional relation to a following noun, the verb thus becoming trans. with the noun as obj.; as interwend (to wend or pass between).

Such formations with ENTER- are found in 15th c., and with inter- from 16th c.: cf. INTERPLACE. Words of this form are much used by S. Daniel c 1600.

b. Denoting 'Between or among themselves or one another; with each other; mutually, reciprocally, alternately (in a vbl. sb., mutual, reciprocal), together': as in interaccuse, -arch, -assure, -balance, -bring, -charge, -chase, -chequer, -circulate, -clash, -clasp, -crystallize, -debate, † -devour, -grapple, -indicate, -jangle, -justle, -loop, -mason, -mat, -match, -maze, -meet, -melt, -minister, -net, -oscillate, -pervade, -pledge, -plight, -pour, -quarrel, -rime, -salute, -shade, -shift, -strive, -talk, -thread, -tie, -vary, -wed, -weld, -wish, -worry, -wrap; also INTERMINGLE, -MARRY, -WEAVE, etc. With a trans. verb, inter- sometimes = 'each other reciprocally' as obj., the resulting verb thus becoming intr.; as interchase to chase each other, -choke, -clasp, -confound, † -enjoy, -touch; also INTERDESPISE, etc.

These appear in 16th c.; see intersalute in 1506, inter-justle in 1591. De Quincey (Logic Pol. Econ., 1844, 18 note) says: 'The late Mr. Coleridge suggested, and by his own example sanctioned, the use of the preposition inter for expressing cases of reciprocal action; or, in his language, of interaction. Thus the verb interpenetrate, when predicated of the substances A and B, implied that by an equal action and reaction, each penetrated the other .. But, even as a justifiable English usage, it may be found occasionally in Shakspere, and much more frequently in Daniel, a writer of the same age'. The stress is on the radical element.

c. With adjs. as INTERMIDDLE.

II. In prepositional relation to the sb. expressed or implied in the second element.

3. Prefixed to sbs., forming sbs., with the senses (a.) 'Space, distance, or part between . . .', esp. in architectural terms, after L. intercolumnium INTERCOLUMN, as inter-dentil, inter-joist, inter-modillion, inter-quarter, interspiral; also inter-world; (b.) 'Period or interval of time between', in words formed on the analogy of INTERREGNUM, as interpapacy, inter-parliament. See also INTERKING, INTERPILASTER.

The stress is on the radical part, but with a monosyllable tends to rest on inter-.

4. Prefixed to adjs. (originally, and most frequently, of Latin origin), in prepositional relation to the sb. implied (as inter-acinous, 'that is inter acinos, between the acini': cf. ANTI- 3, INFRA- 1), or sometimes to a phrase consisting of the adj. + a sb. (as inter-accessory 'between accessory processes').

For the etymology of the second element, see the simple words ACCESSORY, ACINOUS, etc. Ancient Latin had only a very few examples of this formation, as intermūrālis, interamnus, interdigitālis, interlūnis, intermēstis; but their number in modern times, chiefly since 1600, and esp. since 1800, is very great, and they are formed freely when needed. Logically they are composed of inter + L. sb. stem + adj. suffix; but, as the adj. suffix is the same that is used in forming an adj. from the simple word (e.g. national, inter-nation-al, collegi-ate, inter-collegi-ate), they have the form of being composed of inter + adj., and in some later formations, as interhuman, intercapillary, interaccessory, intermolar, this is actually their structure. The main stress is on the radical part.

a. Denoting 'Situated, placed, or occurring locally, between or among (what is implied in the second element)': in modern scientific and other terms (chiefly of Anatomy and Zoology), as interantennal, -antennary (between the antennæ), interapophysial, -capillary, -corallite (see CORALLITE 2), -corpuscular, -coxal (see COXA 2), -cuspidal, -cystic, -epimeral, -fibrillar (-ary), -fibrous, -filamentar, -ligamentary (-ous), -mandibular, -membranous, -mesenterial (-ic), -molar, -muscular, -papillary, -peduncular, -segmental, -spheral, -spicular, -staminal, -sternal, -systematical, -tentacular, -trabecular, -ureteral, -vesicular. d. Loosely used to denote 'Situated, occurring, carried on, etc., between the parts or divisions of . . .', and hence erroneously 'within . . .' (properly expressed by INTRA-): as in inter-asteroidal, -coccygeal, -cranial, -imperial, -mercurial, -parenchymal, -trinitarian: see 6.

5. Prefixed to sbs., forming adjs., with the sense 'Situated, distributed, occurring, carried on, plying, etc. between . . .'; usually of communication, commerce, athletic contests, or the like: as in inter-bourse (between different stock-exchanges), inter-brigade (between brigades), inter-city, -class, -club, -company, -county, -district, -empire, -hemisphere, -island, -school, -street, -team, -town, -university (-'varsity), etc., etc. See also INTER-CELL, INTERSTATE (a 1845 in *U. These are app. all of 19th c. origination, and may be formed at pleasure. For their form and analysis, see what is said under the analogous ANTI-prof. 4. The main stress is on the radical word; but, when this is a monosyllable, tends to shift to inter-.

(see Du Cange), in the phrase damna et interesse, in French legal phraseology dommages et intérêts, the indemnity due to any one for the damage and prejudice done to him. Cf. OF. interest (1290 in Godef.) in sense 'damage', also recompense for damage done or caused, 'damages'. In sense 10 F. interest (now intérêt) occurs in Rabelais, 1535.

10. Money paid for the use of money lent (the principal), or for forbearance of a debt, according to a fixed ratio (rate per cent.).

Interest is paid at fixed intervals, usually once or twice in the year. Simple interest is the interest paid on the principal as lent. Compound († compounded) interest (interest upon interest), is the interest eventually paid on a principal periodically increased by the addition of each fresh amount of interest as it becomes due and remains unpaid. Interest in this sense was formerly called usury, a name still applied when interest is charged at a rate beyond what is considered legitimate or just.

In med.L. interesse (Interest) differed from usura (Usury) in that the latter was avowedly a charge for the use of money, which was forbidden by the Canon Law; whereas originally 'interesse refers to the compensation which under the Roman Law, was due by the debtor who had made default. The measure of compensation was id quod interest, the difference between the creditor's position in consequence of the debtor's laches and the position which might reasonably have been anticipated as the direct consequence of the debtor's fulfilment of his obligation'. This compensation was always permissible when it could be shown that such loss had really arisen (damnum emergens). At a later period, lucrum cessans—loss of profit through inability to reinvest—was also recognized as giving a claim to interesse; both cases appear to be included in the formula damna et interesse. The interesse was originally a fixed sum specified in the contract; but a percentage reckoned periodically, so as to correspond to the creditor's loss, was afterwards substituted (as sometimes in England in the first half of the 13th cent.). Interest in the modern sense was first sanctioned by law (though apparently under cover of the mediæval theory) by 37 Hen. VIII, c. 9 (see quot. 1545); this statute was repealed in 1552, but re-enacted in 1571. (See W. J. Ashley Engl. Econ. Hist. Middle Ages II. 397, 466, and I. S. Leadam in *Dict. Pol. 1702 C. WOLLEY Jrnl. N. York (1860) 44 Which legal faculties and professions .. should not be interlop'd and undermin'd by persons of any other faculties.

[Note. The actual history of the words interlope, interloper, is somewhat obscure. Our earliest examples belong to the end of the 16th c. No form nor cognate of these words is found in any other language until after 1700, when the English sb. was adopted in Fr. as interlopre (Savary Dict. de Comm. 1723), now interlope, applied to a ship, and to a limited extent in Du. and LG. (enterlopen in Halma, 1758-61, enterloper in Bremisches Wbch. 1767). In Du. enterlooper is expressly stated in 1768 to be 'van de Engelse ontleend', borrowed from English, and is explained to mean the same thing as the proper Du. term lorrendraaijer, used from the end of the 16th c. Interlope, interloper were thus of English formation. About 1600, interlopers, intermeddlers, strugglers, straggling Englishmen, occur as appellations of the same class of persons (see INTERLOPER 1a, 1603, INTERMEDDLER c., 1601). Some of these synonyms suggest connexion with land-loper, 'vagabond, vagrant, straggler', in common use before 1580 in place of the earlier land-leaper (1362-1621), lope being the form of leap in eastern and some north-midl. dialects (= north. dial. loup, lowp). It seems probable therefore that the two elements of interloper are identical with those of inter-meddler and land-loper respectively; at least, this seems more likely than that the word should have been compounded of the L. and Engl. prefix inter- and the Du. or LG. lōpen, looper to run, lōper, looper runner, a combination which could not well have arisen in England, and of which we have no historical indication in any foreign parts where English and Dutch traders came in contact. The earliest known references to the practices of interlopers are in connexion with the Russia Company; see Sir E. A. Bond's Introduction to Russia at close of 16th c. (Hakl. Soc. 1856) p. xxi. seqq. But the word soon became a well-known term in connexion with the trade of the East India Company, chartered in 1600.]
